The Question That Rises at Some Time in Every Man's Bosom.

WHY CHRIST CALLED MATTHEW.

He Recognized a Good Man, Although Very Unpopular.

CHRIST'S CRUSADE AGAINST CASTE

WRITTEN FOR THE DISPATCE.

My subject this morning is the call of Matthew. St. Matthew himself in his gospel has told us the circumstances of his call. read, "He saw a man named Matthew sitting at the receipt of custom, and He saith unto him: Follow me. And he arose and followed Him." There is something significant in the fact that Christ saw Matthew at all.

It means that the Divine Reformer, in His zeal for the bettering of man, never forgot men. He knew that society can be represented only by the regeneration of the individual. And if you will think of it, you will see that He worked on that principle always. He made no attempt to get power, either ecclesiastical or civil. He never tried to get any kind of laws passed. He made no effort to organize a party. He took pains to keep away from crowds, and to keep crowds away from Him. He seldom preached to large congregations. On the here and another man there, as He chose Matthew, and to influence that man, and to inspire him with His spirit and His truth, and then to send the man out to influence

That is the only way in which any perma pent good work can be done in this world. Men must be dealt with not as masses but as men. This man must be won, and then another, and each made a center of quiet influence. One of the best things bout this way of doing good is that it is possible to every one of us. We cannot all influence a erowd but we can each of us influence somebody. We cannot all mold public opin-ion, but we can each of us affect somebody's private opinion, and by and by that becomes public opinion of the most perma-

Who is there to whom as much as that is impossible? Christ, passing by, saw Mat-thew, and recognized in him a man who needed help, and straightway set about helping him. You can do as much as that your-

CHRIST SINGLED OUT MATTHEW. Christ, passing by, saw Matthew. He had just been standing an the Capernaum wharf with a great crowd about him; but He had looked over all the naturand faces.

Graphic of the control of He had looked over all the upturned faces and noticed this solitary man sitting at the door of the custom house and listening. There was no crowd big enough to hide a man from Christ.

And Christ, as I was saying last Sunday, came into this world not only to bring a revelation, but to be a revelation. In Christ we see God. And there is one question about God which we cannot help asking. We look out over human life and see the pain in it. We see the good suffering from sorely needed is stricken down, the wise lips on which men wait for guidance are silenced, and accident comes the dam breaks as it did at Johnstown, the rivers overflow as in Japan, the sea rises and the waves engulf the shore, the rail parts and over goes the train into the ditch, and there is no distinction of persons, the good and bad, the helpful and vicious die together, and we cannot help asking: Does God care? Does God, looking out over the masses of human beings which cover the face of the earth, distinguish at all between them? Does He care for me?

That is one of the irregistible questions. And Christ has answered it. He who came to bring a revelation of God has assured us by His blessed words that not a sparrow falls to the ground without God's knowledge. And He who came to be the revelation of revelations looked out over the multitude at Capernum and saw Matthew; and many another time saw many another poor man or woman needing His help and pity and cared for them. Christ, we have seen, was always earing for the individual. And that means that God is always caring for the individual. In the face of all the hard things which come

GOD DOES CARE. But when Christ saw Matthew He saw not only an individual, but an individual of a certain marked type. He saw not only a man, but a peculiar kind of man. He saw a man whom the religious people of that day, if they had chanced to look at him, would have turned their backs on. He saw brew pocketbook, and that was bad enough. But it outraged the Hebrew sense of justice: it symbolized tyranny and idolatry; it was a perpetual and exasperating reminder of their loss of civil and religious liberty, and that emphasized their hatred. A tax gathere was an oppressor and a thicf and a renegade and a traitor and an infidel and in general a disreputable rascel. No money out of the publicans' strong box could go into the Temple treasury. No money changer would change it. I cannot think that the opportunity to getany of it for the temple treasury came very often; but when it did—No! There was not water enough in all the Sea of Galilee to make the coin clean which had been elenched in the hand of the publican. The publicans were shut out of everything. The orthodox and loyal had no use for them, either political, ecclesistical or social. orthodox and loyal had no use for them, either political, ecclesistical or social.

AND MATTHEW WAS A PUBLICAN. And yet Christ saw Matthew, and was at once interested in Matthew, and all the prejudice of all the people of Palestine affected Him not for an instant.

We hardly know which to wonder at the most, as we study the life of Christ: whether at the people whom He chose, or at the people whom He did not choose. He behaved himself upon principles so opposite to those which were current in His trial, upon principles which even to-day are not understood very generally-and certainly not acted upon very generally—that one cannot predict beforehand, even after following Him closely, what He will may or what He will do. He meets a Samaritan woman beside a well where He has stopped to rest. She is a Samaritan, and a woman, and having had five husbands is living now with a man who is not her husliving now with a man who is not her hus-band. Here are three damaging facts, any one of which would have turned away the widest-minded rabbi of that day. Christ en-gages her in conversation, and makes known to her the proloundest religious truth He has to teach. One night there comes to Him has to teach. One night there comes to Him a man named Nicodemus, a ruler of the Jews. This man is impressed and partly persuaded. He is a person of austority and influence. Here is a great chance for the persuaded. He is a person of authority and influence. Here is a great chance for the Master to strengthen his position, to gain His way among the church lenders to get the prestige of influential patronage. He gives Nicodemus no encouragement. He tells him that he must first be born again. It is the same when a young enthusiastic convert, having great possessions, comes to Him. Here is an opportunity again to help on the cause' opportunity the cause'

I suppose that money meant just as much in those days as it does now. Here was a man of money, all ready by a little easy management to be brought into the church.

At once Christ puts him to the severest kind of test. And the young man goes

DOES HE CARE-FOR ME away sorrowful, carrying all his money with him.

A WONDERFUL STUDY. And now here is Matthew-Matthew the publican. Christ could have done nothing more evidently impolitic than to take this man, with no reputation-except a bad one-with no contribution to make to the cause except the contribution of increased unpopularity, into His company. He knew perfectly well what a talk it would make. His name was already none too good among the Rabbis for His followings with questionable people. But actually to take this publican into the circle of His intimate disciples, Christ knew perfectly well, when he did that, that the whole religious and social world would be scandalized by it. I do not find, however, that that made any difference to Him. Christ was essentially and conscientiously democratic. He recognized a man wherever He found him; and when He found a man He paid no attention to his dress, or his house; or his bank "As Jesus went forth from thence," we read, "He saw a man named Matthew sitting the prejudice which surrounded him. That is what brotherhood means. Brotherhood is not simply a kindly feeling of the rich toward the poor, it is not merely a touch of charity in the heart of virtue at the sight of vice, it is not satisfied by methods of co-operation or by settlements by arbitration; brotherhood begins with a recognition of manhood and womanhood. The way out in these unbrotherly days is along the path of sympathy; that is of genuine fellow-feeling. Any consideration of aristocracy which keeps a man from recognizing another man as big, as good as himself because he works in a mill, which keeps a woman from recog-nizing the equal worth of another woman because she sells cloth by the yard behind a no effort to organize a party. He took pains to keep away from crowds, and to keep crowds away from Him. He seldom preached to large congregations. On the contrary, His way was to single out a man here and another man there, as He chose Matthews and to influence that man, and to GEORGE HODGES

He saw a despised man, a man burdened with universal unpopularity. Everybody hated Matthew. Nobody could think of any name too bad for him.

Because Matthew was one who sat at the receipt of customs. He was one of the Capernaum revenue officers. The tax collector has never in any country been a particularly welcome guest. But in Judea he was disliked on principle. Not only did he take the people's money, and as much of it as he could, and in a thousand vexatious ways, but the money went out of the country to a foreign government, and that an alien to their religion. Taxation touched the Hebrew pocketbook, and that was bad enough.
